Handwriting

Different movies use different fonts to create atmosphere and give you a clue about their genre. Look at the fonts used here...

What font would you use for Julius Caesar? Use this box to create your own font to write the title in. Think about colours and background as well as the shapes of the letters.

Main Activity

Great movies have thousands and thousands of camera shots in but for a trailer you have to choose just the parts you show carefully. You can't have too many or the trailer will be too long and you need to make sure you give away enough of the story that people understand, but not so much that they aren't drawn in to knowing what happened next!

Watch this trailer for a Star Wars movie. (again, the film is a 12a but the trailer isn't scary – check with an adult at home that they're happy for you to watch it first.). If not, you can use the Onwards trailer, which is a U.

Onward - https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=x8DKg\_fsacM

Whichever trailer you choose, you need to try and break it down into tiny little scenes. How many times is there writing on the screen? How many different scenes are there? Do they show the plot of the film? Or do they introduce different characters? Do they set the scene? Are they supposed to make you laugh, make you frightened, draw you in or build suspense? See if for each mini-scene you can figure out why it's been included

(I've started this off for Star Wars but you can continue it for Onward, I'm just putting this to give you an example)

Scene	Why it's been included
Glowing green logo that says "Lucasfilms"	To let the audience know which company produced the film
Desert planet, character does a backflip jump over a space ship	To show the film has impressive stunts.
